O'pium. n. ſ. A juice, partly of the reſinous, partly of the gummy kind. It is brought to us in flat cakes or maſſes, very heavy and of a denſe texture, not perfectly dry: its colour is a dark browniſh yellow; its ſmell is of a dead faint kind; and its taſte very bitter and very acrid. It is brought from Natolia, Egypt, and the Eaſt-Indies, produced from the white garden poppy; with which the fields of Aſia-Minor are in many places ſown. When the heads grow to maturity, but are yet ſoft, green and full of juice, inciſions are made in them, and from every one of theſe a few drops flow of a milky juice, which ſoon hardens into a ſolid conſiſtence. The fineſt opium proceeds from the firſt inciſions. What we generally have is the mere crude juice, worked up with water, or honey ſufficient to bring it into form. Externally applied it is emollient, relaxing and diſcutient, and greatly promotes ſuppuration. A moderate doſe of opium taken internally, is generally under a grain, yet cuſtom will make people bear a dram, but in that caſe nature is vitiated. Its firſt effect is the making the patient cheerful; it removes melancholy, and diſſipates the dread of danger; the Turks always take it when they are going to battle: it afterwards quiets the ſpirits, eaſes pain, and diſpoſes to ſleep. After the effect is over, the pain generally returns in a more violent manner; the ſpirits become lower than before, and the pulſe languid. An immoderate doſe of opium brings on drunkenneſs, cheerfulneſs and loud laughter, at firſt, and, after many terrible ſymptoms, death itſelf. Thoſe who have accuſtomed themſelves to an immoderate uſe of opium, are apt to be faint, idle, and thoughtleſs; they loſe their appetite, and grow old before their time. Hill.

Sleep hath forſook and giv'n me o'er
To death's benumbing opium as my only cure. Milton.

PLA'NET. n. ſ. [planeta, Lat. ϖλανάω; planette, French.] Planets are the erratick or wandering ſtars, and which are not like the fixt ones always in the ſame poſition to one another: we now number the earth among the primary planets, becauſe we know it moves round the ſun, as Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Venus and Mercury do, and that in a path or circle between Mars and Venus: and the moon is accounted among the ſecondary planets or ſatellites of the primary, ſince ſhe moves round the earth: all the planets have, beſides their motion round the ſun, which makes their year, alſo a motion round their own axe, which makes their day; as the earth's revolving ſo makes our day and night; it is more than probable, that the diameters of all the planets are longer than their axes: we know 'tis ſo in our earth; and Flamſteed and Caſſini found it to be ſo in Jupiter: Sir Iſaac Newton aſſerts our earth's equatorial diameter to exceed the other about thirty-four miles; and indeed elſe the motion of the earth would make the ſea riſe ſo high at the equator, as to drown all the parts thereabouts. Harris.
